01

You type the same information into more than one system.

Customer details in one place, the invoice in another, the booking somewhere else. Every re-type is time lost and a chance for mistakes.

02

Month-end means days of spreadsheets.

If closing the books depends on copying figures between programs, your systems aren't doing their job.

03

Only one person knows how it all works.

When the knowledge lives in one head, the whole business carries the risk.

04

You can’t see how you’re performing without asking someone.

Good systems show you sales, stock and cash at a glance, without a phone call.

05

Your systems don’t talk to each other.

Software that doesn't share information creates work. Connecting what you already have is often the simplest first fix.
